About Us

Rangbheeni is a grassroots initiative addressing the interconnected crises of textile waste, climate change, and social inequity. India produces nearly 7.8 million tonnes of textile waste annually, much of which is dumped or burned near low-income settlements. These practices pollute air, soil, and water, exposing marginalized communities, especially women and children, to severe health risks such as respiratory illness and skin diseases. At the same time, textile waste contributes to greenhouse gas emissions, intensifying floods, heatwaves, and other climate impacts that these communities are least equipped to withstand.

Women in such communities often remain unemployed or relegated to unsafe, exploitative waste-picking roles, while their children face barriers to education, perpetuating cycles of poverty.

Rangbheeni transforms this challenge into opportunity by upcycling textile waste into sustainable products, creating dignified livelihoods for women and investing in children's education, making those most vulnerable to climate change part of the solution.

We Engage in:

- Sustainability Practices: Promoting zero-waste living by upcycling discarded fabrics into versatile, eco-friendly products.
- Skill Development and Livelihoods: Conducting various skill development training programs for women, enabling them to create handmade, upcycled products.
- Social Impact: Supporting women's development and child education through various initiatives and events.

Our Mission

- To transform textile waste into sustainable solutions by empowering marginalized women with dignified livelihoods and ensuring better educational opportunities for their children, making those most affected by climate change part of the solution and agents of change.

Our Vision

- A sustainable world where waste is reimagined as a resource, women drive inclusive climate action, and every child has the opportunity to learn and flourish.
